Andy Hogue, Ph.D., is director of the Philanthropy and Public Service Program and senior lecturer in the Baylor's Honors Program.

Biography

Andy Hogue, Ph.D., serves as director of the Philanthropy and Public Service Program and senior lecturer in the Honors Program at Baylor University. His teaching focuses primarily on social innovation, philanthropy and civic leadership, providing students with hands-on opportunities to innovate, lead and work toward the greater good of their community and world. Students in Hogue's courses explore the art, science and practice of philanthropy and social innovation and direct over $100,000 each year to organizations that drive social change and promote human flourishing.

Hogue is the author of "Stumping God: Reagan, Carter, and the Invention of a Political Faith," published in 2012 by Baylor University Press, which explains how and why religion became an important factor in modern presidential elections. He is at work on two books related to philanthropy and social innovation.

He writes for the Waco Tribune-Herald and regularly consults on grant-making for foundations, grant-seeking for nonprofits and philanthropy education for universities. His work and commentary have been featured throughout North America in media outlets, such as Stanford Social Innovation Review, CBS Radio, Baptist News Global and Taegan Goddard's Political Wire.

Hogue earned a B.A. in communication from Clemson University, an M.A. in church-state studies from Baylor University and a Ph.D. in political science from Baylor.
