Professor of Sociology, specializing in immigration and refugee studies and survey methods

Biography

My research agenda focuses on the integration and resettlement of refugees and immigrants. My latest projects focus on refugees and their long-term labour market outcomes, along with the educational trajectories of refugee children and youth. I have also examined how immigrants use settlement services and in identifying the newcomers who need but cannot access services. Another project focuses on the long-term labour market trajectories of those arriving to Canada as children or teens. The rationale is that although we know much about the arrival experiences of adults in the labour market, very little is known about long-term labour market outcomes among those who have had some exposure to the Canadian education system. Other areas of interest include the health outcomes of newcomer children and youth and labour market transitions of immigrant women. I have good statistical and qualitative training and have provided assistance with a variety of projects including a study of the non-fracture needs of hospitalized Winnipeggers, bullying and victimization experiences of newcomer youth.
