Biography

Cat calls, honking and whistling aren't just annoying to the object of unsolicited sexual advances; they can be traumatic. That's the discovery psychologist Mindy Erchull and her colleagues at the University of Mary Washington found after interviewing nearly 350 women for the study on sexual objectification "Stop Looking at Me!," published in the Psychology of Women Quarterly.

"Women who undergo more evaluation of their bodies by others and women who experience more unwanted sexual advances also had more body shame and more trauma symptoms," said Dr. Erchull, an expert in sexualization of women, feminism and feminist identity.

In addition to her recent research, she has conducted research on how jealousy is perceived by men and women, and its relationship to violence.

Honored by the American Psychological Association as an emerging leader, Dr. Erchull has extensive expertise in social psychology, health psychology, psychology of women, women's health, social influence, and statistics and research methods. She also serves as a consulting editor for Psychology of Women Quarterly, Women's Reproductive Health, and Gender Issues. In addition, she also regularly reviews manuscripts for other journals including Sex Roles, Health Care for Women International and Basic and Applied Social Psychology.

She has presented her work at numerous conferences including meetings of the American Psychological Association, the Association for Psychological Science and the Association for Women in Psychology. She has also published articles on her research in such academic journals as Psychology of Women Quarterly, Sex Roles, Personality and Social Psychology Bulletin, and Health Psychology, most recently "Desire for Marriage and Children: A Comparison of Feminist and Non-feminist Women" in Gender Issues.
